Description

In this graduate/postgraduate/faculty seminar we will study historically grounded concepts to explore the institutional, material, and cultural relationships or knots between feminist theory and activism and imperialism in their modern historical and contemporary modalities. We consider how theory is deemed to be theory and its relationships to hegemonic ideology and practices and material relations. Readings examine cultural, economic and intellectual imperialism, which is the focus of feminist and sexual theorization and critique in many parts of the world, as well as leftist movements as sites of anti-imperialist feminist and sexual theorizing and critique. In addition to following the money in the cases of the Open Society Institute and Ford Foundation, we examine a few "cultural" case studies (pinkwashing, Femen, Pussy Riot) where feminist and queer activism and solidarity align with imperialism and colonization. We will repeatedly revisit the question of whether and to what degree universal projects of feminist theory/feminism and queer theory/activism are possible and consider where that leaves us as thinkers, teachers, and community members.

Ideas and discussions and thus an intellectual community will be built over time together, whether or not participants are formally enrolled. It is jarring to this dynamic and community to miss sessions or chronically attend late or leave early.

All participants are encouraged to and graduate students must write three questions (50-100 words) on the given day's readings and email them to Frances and Anna by 9 am of that Wednesday. We will also ask you to share your questions at the beginning of each class.

All participants are encouraged and graduate students will lead two class discussions (one during the first six weeks; the other during the last six weeks) on the given day's readings and, a week later, will write and submit a response essay on the readings discussed in that class meeting.

Final grades will be based on the weekly questions, two essays based on the two discussions students lead, and informed attendance and participation.
